Osceola interview

A conversation with Richard Riley, part II

Last week Osceola published the first half of a two-part interview with Democratic gubernatorial candidate Richard Riley, a former state senator from Greenville County. (For background on Riley's candidacy, see last week's issue.) In this week's conclusion, Riley offers his views on minority issues,nuclear proliferation in South Carolina, industrial development and environmental protection, his ties with the textile industry, and much more.

Interviews with other gubernatorial candidates will appear here as the 1978 campaign progresses.

Midway through our interview, Riley began a discussion of his concept of responsible political and public conduct. He cited his involvement in an "extremely emotional" situation which emerged in Greenville County following 1970 federal court order mandating complete integration of public school system in 30 days.

Riley: I went on the radio for a couple of hours, as I recollect, simply to answer questions, respond to people's inquiries. I remember, I asked the people in Greenville to stay in school. I had four children and they were all in the public schools and I was proud of that. I was the person who was a spokesman for, come on now let's get in here, we've got 30 days, let's get busy, the time is going by. I was on the citizen's committee to perfect that in 30 days and we did. There has been a movie made about it. Integration with grace and style. I was in the middle of that and the reason I was was because it was important. When that happened, I don't remember what was going on in Columbia, reapportionment whatever, but I set that aside because that was the important thing in Greenville at that time.

OS: Wasn't your father involved in that somehow as an attorney?

Riley: Yes, he represented the school system as the elected county attorney.

OS: The plan that you worked out, the plan with "grace and style"...

Riley: I didn't work it out, but I threw myself into it, and I was certainly involved in it.

OS: How about prior to the court order?

Riley: Prior to the court order we had had a series of court orders that had called for various degrees of integration, just as everybody else had.

OS: Well what was your role prior to the court order? Obviously the district had resisted to the point where the judge felt this immediate integration order was necessary.

Riley: My role as a legislator?

OS: As a prominent public leader in the community.

Riley: Like what? On integration?

OS: Were you speaking out prior to the final court order?

Riley: I spoke out when the time came before and after the court order to speak out. I don't remember any specifics, but I was an outspoken proponent of public

The price is wrong

Think of the price system as an information medium, at its best perhaps the most efficient medium. For after all, the price of any given good or service immediately tells one ostensibly how society values that good or service and by comparison how one must value it himself. A price, then, is a compact signal reporting upon the scarcity, or value, of that which is priced. But the price system is not a perfect information medium. Many times it conveys false signals. Even more oftentimes, it fails to respond to changes in supply or demand. In fact, failure of the price system lies at the very heart of most economic problems. This is true whether one speaks of mass unemployment, or the simple inability to buy a good five-cent cigar.

Extending the logic, it can be said that the very essence of monopoly power is the power to control prices. You can think of the local car mechanic who, once he has your car, can extract whatever price he chooses. Or you can go to the grocery store and find twenty brands of toothpaste, all priced identically, regardless of demand. Or turn on the television set, and note that the local stations will run some Godawful public service announcement in place of a commercial, rather than lower their advertising rates in periods of slack demand.

Worse than that, recall the last time you bought an expensive stereo receiver or (if you're a tacky sort) a CB radio. Odds are that you're not an electronic design engineer and hence you are unqualified to truly judge the quality of the various models for sale. And since the costs of nonprice information (in this case information on the quality of a highly technical good) are very high, you tend to use price information perversely. You tend to use prices as an index of quality, and you buy the most expensive set you can possible afford, under the assumption that it must be the best. Merchants know this, and when they sell items of complex manufacture, or items of snob appeal, they tend to price them high, so people will think the products are "good enough". We tend to think that because something's cheap, it must be worthless. Of course, more often than not it is, but in our ignorance we can't distinguish when it isn't.

When you thing about it, the failures of the price system, and the high, many times prohibitive costs of nonprice product information, comprise a most serious penalty to consumers, while at the same time ensuring downward price rigidity, leading to inflation.

> "...Some turkey out in TV-land takes Datril because he wants to be like John Wayne. A teenage girls buys Clairol Short n' Sassy because she wants to look like Dorothy Hamill, skating her cute little ass around a frozen pond in a TV commercial..."

As a result, consumers pay unnecessarily high prices for heavily advertised products because they lack the knowledge to tell whether, say, Marantz stereo receivers are any better than Sears bargain basement do-it-yourself specials; or they lack even the ability to know whether Geritol is more healthful than Rexall vitamins. In any case, prices don't help, because the oligopolist producers of such products make sure the prices are the same. Thus they can safely compete for a larger market share by advertising, and they need not worry about losing profits by "ruinous" price-cutting. Of course, those oligopolists whose products don't sell will lose money. But that can be cured by an advertising campaign.

We examine the vast array of branded products, the hundred and one different mouthwashes touted on television, and we think we have a delightful variety of products to choose from. But upon close scrutiny, we learn they're all the same: only the names differ, and only the images change. In economics, we call this image differentiation, which is only a shorthand way of describing products advertised not to be cheaper than other goods, nor to be substantively better, but to convey an image that appeals to the broad masses. Some turkey out in TV-land takes Datril because he wants to be like John Wayne. A teenage girl buys Clairol Short n' Sassy because she wants to look like Dorothy Hamill, skating her cute little ass around a frozen pond in a TV commercial.

On a broader scale, the failure of prices to adjust accounts for unnecessary unemployment. Firms which, perhaps years ago would have lowered prices when demand for their products falls off, instead keep prices constant and cut back on production--which means laying off or firing employees. Worse than that, in the 1970s, large oligopoly manufacturers have even raised prices during recessions, at the same time they were laying off hundreds of workers.

And when you hear someone speak of our wonderful "free enterprise system," recall that such an idealized system can only work when prices respond immediately to changes in cost and demand conditions, thus to equate supply and demand. Our economy is shot through with monopoly elements, and prices that respond well to changes in supply and demand are the decided exception. Farm prices offer one of the few real-life examples, and farmers perennially fight to have the government curb this terrible anomaly. To a degree government has, with its price supports.

And when you hear some Godfearing free enterpriser rail against gov'mint regulations, recall that even with the tangle of regulations now extant, businessmen manage to cheat and exploit the consumer unmercifully, simply because the consumer can't distinguish between good workmanship or bad, regarding many complex products; and because the price system gives him no

Don Fowler

Intra-party warfare

The state Democratic Party may be gearing up for some serious internal warfare. Skirmishes and firefights are nothing new but this one may be a pitched battle, likely to develop between now and next spring, when the party meets in convention to perform its biennial tasks, including the selection of a state party chairman.

The controversy, as always, centers around present party chairman and former party executive director Don Fowler. Various elements in the party are dissatisfied, to say the least, with Fowler's performance as chairman. Young progressives, with roots in the 1972 S.C. McGovern campaign and the '74 Ravenel gubernatorial campaign, have criticized Fowler for his partisan support of what they view as old-time party hacks and for his failure to "democratize" the party--to develop a grass-roots organization which is more participatory and less financially dependent on traditional party "fat cats."

"Fowler hasn't developed money-raising sources outside of the Party fat cats," one party member and observer says. "His closest ties are with the relatively small group of bankers and businessmen who have bankrolled the party in the past."

The observer points out that the party is still heavily in debt from previous campaigns. "The fat cats play a game of letting the party get in debt and stay in debt. This makes party leaders more controllable; you know, 'we're heavily in debt; we need these fat cats.' It's a vicious cycle."

Many of the younger progressive types favor a party reorganization that would place more emphasis on developing strong county-by-county party organizations and broadening the base of financial support; i.e., more money from the 'little people' and less dependency on a few wealthy and therefore powerful party members.

And the younger, more progressive types aren't the only party members who are down on Fowler. Many of the older moderate-to-conservative party faithful are also dissatisfied. The reasons vary; some are critical of his behind-the-scenes support of favored candidates during Democratic primaries--elections during which, they feel, the party chairman should remain non-partisan. Some are disgruntled by what they perceived as Fowler's autocratic way of handling party matters; they claim, for example, that it is difficult to obtain accurate information on the party's financial condition. One senator and executive committee member says the only way he can get an overview of party finances is to examine financial disclosure documents required by the federal government and filed with the state election commission.

In a recent column on this subject, Greenville News reporter Tom Mason wrote that "party stalwarts--such as powerful senators Marion Gressette and Rembert Dennis--don't like the way Fowler makes pronouncements of party policy on his own." Mason quotes a senator who is a member of the executive committee: "Don is inclined to call a press conference and say something is party policy, then we have to back it up. He hasn't made many friends doing that."

For years disgruntled party members have accused Fowler of vindictiveness, of making effective use of the reward-and-punish method of management. "If you agree with Don," one former party official says, "good things begin to happen to you. If not, you're out in the cold."

At present Fowler is making noises to the effect that he won't run again for party chairman come next spring and the new election. Whether he runs or not, an intra-party battle is sure to develop between the candidate (s) of anti-Fowler forces and Fowler or his designated successor.

In fact, the battle has already been joined. When party executive director Martha Marr resigned recently to accept a political campaign post, the party's executive committee convened to discuss a successor. There was some talk of appointing an interim director, but the pro- con-Fowler forces quickly polarized around two possible candidates for the interim post, and a decision was finally made to do without until a more permanent director could be selected. One observer says: "The interim director thing began to look like a showdown, and I think the majority felt that while a showdown is inevitable, this wasn't the thing to have it over."

Thusfar about 16 people have applied for the executive director's post. "Few of them are heavyweights," a committee source says. "A few are PhDs with credentials but little political experience." While the party will continue to accept applications at least through the end of July, the frontrunner at this point appears to be George Johnson, an executive committeeman from Greenville. Johnson is about 30, has been involved in Party affairs for the past eight years, and has a progressive image. His supporters believe he is an attractive candidate because he is popular with younger, more liberal party members, and through his position as a public relations officer with the Liberty Corporation, has ties with the older, more conservative "money sources" (as one observer calls them) as well.

A member of the anti-Fowler camp, Johnson is aligned with party vice-chairperson Mary Demetrious. Demetrious was elected to the party's number two post at the last convention--"over Fowler's dead body," some sources say. She is not popular with the Fowler forces; some party insiders say she has been all but ignored by Fowler, former Governor Bob McNair, and others of similar persuasion.

Demetrious is at the forefront of a move to displace Fowler and replace him with a chairperson willing to transform the party into a more open, participatory, "grass-roots" body. A member of this 'movement' says, "we want to turn the party into a neutral vehicle within which the various intra-party factions can operate. We want to be fair."

Demetrious would like to take over the party chairmanship herself and is already campaigning for the post; barring that, she and other younger, progressive members will back a candidate who meets the "neutrality" requirement. Although some party members express surprise when Demetrious is mentioned as a possible Fowler successor ("she's not a heavyweight," one says somewhat disdainfully), others point to her successful coup at the last state convention when she beat out a Fowler-supported candidate for the vice-chairmanship. "She's got the contacts, and she knows how to organize," one source says. "She's a serious contender."

The first real party showdown will likely come with the selection of an executive director. Johnson is expected to have considerable support. Some observers feel Fowler -- who is not expected to support Johnson -- is not in a strong enough position to designate someone for the post, "but he might be able to say 'no' to somebody and force an interim situation" until next spring's convention.

What will happen then? "There's always the possibility," one observer says, "that nothing will happen, that people will look at the financial situation, etc. and come crawling to Fowler, saying 'oh, Don, we need you. Stay one more year.' Fowler's best strategy is probably to hold out--not be an active candidate--and hope they come begging." The observer adds, however, that the begging may be over. "Fowler's sins may have caught up with him. This is an off political year, the Republicans are really no threat and that takes some of the 'stick-together' pressure off. In an off-year, the older more conservative party-liners generally dominate, but Fowler's problems are as much personal as ideological, and a lot of the old party-liners are dissatisfied. This could be the year he loses it."

Brief rumors department: Rep. Jean Toal, D-Richland, is definitely out of the lt. governor's race, but she is still considering a run for attorney general.

Senator Tom Smith, D-Florence, is looking over the primary race for lt. governor. He joins a long list of 'possibles,' including (most recently) U.S. Rep. Ken Holland, who is in trouble in his congressional district; Rep. Nancy Stevenson of Charleston; Sen. Alex Sanders, D-Richland; Sen. Horace Smith, D-Spartanburg (both Sanders and Smith were unsuccessful candidates for the post in 1974), and others too numerous to mention.

The talk is that U.S. Rep. James Mann's ethics problems over the past two years have placed him in a precarious situation; some Democratic observers doubt he will offer again. Republican Senator Carroll Campbell of Greenville is expected to oppose him in the 1978 general election, and sources say some Democrats in the Fourth Congressional District, afraid Mann will be unable to fend off Campbell, are looking around for a stronger Democratic candidate.

Mixing music and feminist politics

In terms of obtaining a high quality product, music and politics are a tricky pair to mix. It's hard enough to create publishable material when there are only musical and lyrical factors to consider, much less when the incorporation of ideology is desired as well. Depicting theory appealingly presents a particular problem, just as the détermination of priority in a situation of such compound intention requires unusual clarity of purpose.

The most enduring songs are those that tap a universal emotional core, touching on loves and hates and pains that are intimately, cyclically familiar to all of us; however they are elicited. It's the songwriter's deeply personal exposure, or her/his ability to sensitively portray some aspect of the complexity of emotions we deal with, that evokes the listener's empathy. Political considerations are a level away from that private space, determinants in the value frameworks we set up to orient and structure our lives, the rational guiding the irrational inner self. As such, political perspectives are unique for each person, although of course there are areas of common ground. Still, singing of them often only establishes contact with those who already share the ideas. Even among people who consider themselves adherents to a particular political philosophy, a thousand different approaches are generally forthcoming on any given issue.

So the trick with political music, it seems, is to highlight emotion, the essence of emphatic communication, within a political perspective, without obscuring the former by being too overt. Which is really just a manifestation of a basic precept of leftist politics -- that the personal is political, and vice versa. Politics is how you live your life, what value system you sift your feelings and perceptions through.

Rock and blues, to take two examples, deal largely with gut level feelings. But all too typically the lyrical framework accompanying the music approaches misogyny. So what you have is quality, exciting music marred by the world view through which it is represented. The other side of that coin, of course, and perhaps even more frustrating, is unimpressive music coupled with a political perspective that is harmonious with, say, my own. I would love to just let my heart fold around a figure on stage, allow my bruised and battered feminist consciousness to relax and exult and enjoy right along with those emotional facets of myself that respond so fiercely to rock and roll sensuality and defiance, and with such heartfelf empathy to nuances of introspection. I figure if I can ever get the euphoric high induced by really good music to coincide with the deep satisfaction I feel from actually hearing things I believe up on that stage or on that album, from not having to consciously or subconsciously filter the lyrics so that just the music comes through, I may never want to come down again.

Well, you can't have it all, they say, and the July 15 concert at the Columbia YWCA of self-professed "Maryland Cowgirl" Casse Culver would lead one to believe they may be right. Culver sings women's music, for and by women; her recent LP Three Gypsies was recorded by Wise Women Enterprises and distributed through Olivia Records, both feminist music collectives, both devoted to the development of women's music.

Singer/songwriter Culver has the credentials all right, and the backing; her album, the first with a Country and Western emphasis to be feminist-produced, features a multitude of country-style instruments and musicians, resulting in a buoyant, homey sound, her voice accompanied by banjos, mandolins, electric and acoustic guitars, cello, bass, keyboards, flute, autoharp, and mouth harp. Some of Culver's songs are intensely evocative, most notably the title cut; otherwise she has done a pretty good job of singing of her own feelings, framed in a feminist perspective.

What she lacks, unfortunately, is any exceptional talent. Culver proved to be at best an average entertainer, an adequate keyboard player and guitarist, an enjoyable and boisterous autoharpist, and a fairly powerful singer with little expression. Backed by lyrical bassist Barbara Cobb, who did what she could in terms of C&W bass variations, Culver seemed ill at ease in the spotlight. She compensated by attempting to manipulate the audience into responsiveness rather than allowing them time to warm to her.

Her style is not so high-energy, nor so immediately engaging, as to be anywhere near irresistible. She tried to exercise too much control, the opposite of what I find appealing in a performer. The intended atmosphere seemed to be a natural one, but Dolly Parton with her wigs and five-inch heels acts more real.

Culver started her set warmly, on acoustic guitar with "I'm Late Again," she and Cobb grinning broadly, much of the audience responding in kind. Next was her "motorcycle love song," "Crystal Skies," enhanced by a full tender intro on mouth harp. Her country leanings were more in evidence here.

Culver's attempts at evocation fell wide on "She Said Sun", with mood subtleties indicated only by vocal volume and tempo changes. She was trying hard to win the audience over, but I found myself resisting her. The traditional "First Until These Hills" closed the first set with Culver on autoharp, arousing "Three Gypsies," the most successful song of the evening, opened the second, which contained mostly more songs from her album, a new anti-Anita number, and an amusing cockroach tune magically produced in honor of a gigantic one that clambered up the wall behind her.

Casse Culver is far more significant in terms of her contributions to a young movement than for the quality of her musicical offerings. A union of the best of feminism and rock is yet to come.

The other side of nausea

The Other Side of Midnight, continuing to play at the Miracle theatre on Main Street, ought to be a piece of great summer trash, but instead it's a piece of terrible, boring trash, with almost nothing to recommend it to anyone. There have been a number of loudly advertised movies in Columbia this summer, passing themselves off as popular entertainment, and of the lot, Star Wars is by far the best, with Sorcerer a close second, and Exorcist II and The Other Side of Midnight competing for bottom-of-the-barrel honors. It seems as though popular movies made for a large market have to be stupid, dull and ineptly made in order to merit major studio release, and large advertising budgets. Against a lumbering dinosaur like The Other Side, a low budget piece of fluff like Smokey and the Bandits looks good.

It becomes harder and harder to visualize, but it is possible to make an interesting, mildly entertaining movie out of a book like The Other Side, a big glossy movie with money, expensive clothes and sets, larger-than-life sex and betrayal, and a plot you don't have to take seriously to enjoy. But that kind of movie has its own requirements, and The Other Side fulfills none of them. It begins slowly, drags on for nearly three hours (including an intermission) and switches around some important plot developments, while reducing the high points of melodrama to a uniform level of predictability. Everything about this movie feels wrong, but instead of feeling angry you feel numb and cheated.

The book, written by Sidney Sheldon, was the kind of summer reading perfect for the beach or pool, and that's where I read it last summer. It was mildly entertaining in a silly, undemanding way, and I expected a movie that would be the same. Instead, this puff-pastry is passed off as a "romance of passion and power", and the promotional material urges exhibitors to appeal to the middle-aged women in their market who want to escape into a world of "glamour, danger and love." Several middle-aged women who sat behind me in the audience said they were glad they hadn't paid full admission price (it was a discount afternoon show); they were disappointed in the film, but suggested perhaps I could find something nice to say about the clothes and the scenery. Well, perhaps I can, but that isn't enough, not even for a mildly entertaining "summer movie."

The details of the film are uniformly bad, but not bad enough to be funny (as in Exorcist II). Location shots (Paris during W.W. II and Greek islands sometime in the fifties) are like travelogue footage, too bright, and full of anonymous "identifying features" like the Eifel Tower or the Parthenon. The clothes are an important part of the film, at least as important as the music, and are like landmarks telling you whether the women are supposed to be happy or sexy or "glamourous". They bring back the feeling of the fifties more successfully than anything else in the movie, with screaming yellow-daisy hats and matching stiletto heels.

> "...John Beck couldn't charm a lamp, and he has all the romantic appeal of an inflatable rubber doll..."

One can only hope that the actors in this movie made profitable financial deals, because they couldn't be getting anything else out of it. Almost everyone comes off badly, but some are infinitely worse. Susan Sarandon, as the American Wife, bugs her eyes out and gulps alot, trying to look like a smart-talking ingenue come to the big city to land an exciting job. She gets the job, marries the Hero-Jerk, and continues to look bugeyed while delivering some of the most unfortunate lines ever heard. Marie-France Pisier does somewhat better with a meatier role as the Abandoned Girl, who vows revenge on the Jerk, for leaving her pregnant in Paris at the end of W.W. II. She shrugs alot to show she's French, and becomes a famous model and film-star without ever doing anything more strenuous than touching up her make-up, and applying techniques learned from The Sensuous Woman on a famous director. But she does get to play hysterical and slightly crazy and she is pleasant to look at while doing so.

The big disaster of the movie is John Beck as the Jerk; romantic, dashing, W.W. II flying ace Larry Douglas. This character is a descendant of the irresistable, debonair cad, played by Errol Flynn and others in countless melodramas in the thirties and fourties. It requires an actor with a handsome face and body, and the kind of charm and sexual prowess capable of conquering women on two continents. John Beck couldn't charm a lamp, and he has all the romantic appeal of an inflatable rubber doll. The movie falls apart as soon as he appears, and when he plays a love scene your impulse is to snicker rather than swoon. He is physically wrong for the part, with a ski-jump chin and huge ears, and a wooden, irritating voice. He may be able to act (Woody Allen put him in a small role in Sleeper) but you would never know from his performance in this movie. His role is so crucial to the movie's success, it is a measure of producer Frank Yablans ineptness that he would cast someone like Beck, and totally ruin a movie that might have been saved by a capable, movie-handsome hunk of an actor.

The Other Side of Midnight could be an entertaining way to spend an afternoon, but instead it's an expensive means of wasting time and money, and lets hope it leaves Columbia very soon. (An ABC Theatre spokesman told me that Marty Feldman's remake of Beau Geste is scheduled for the Miracle, when The Other Side finally leaves.)

by Elton Manzione

"I think, gentlemen, we have a twofold purpose: to attract investors by offering a fair rate of return and to provide the people of the state of South Carolina with enough electric service to provide for their needs and attract new industry. We are vitally interested in the economic growth of the state of South Carolina," one witness testifies.

"Gentlemen, our econometric model is based on federal government figures, and by it we predict a rate of growth in electric usage of 7.9 percent per year. This is supported by historical patterns and should hold true for the future," another witness says.

Yes folks, it is the biennial circus known as the SCE&G rate hike hearing, currently playing before the public service commission, and the words of the two witnesses indicate two of the more popular postures of utility companies who plead their cases before the Public Service Commission; the posture of patriot and the posture of pundit.

The patriot pleads the case that increased utility rates are a boon to the citizens of the state. A bigger utility attracts bigger industry, brings more money and more economic growth, attracts more outside investment in the state and therefore provides a bigger piece of the economic "free enterprise pie" to all concerned. Couched in the patriot posture is the implicit threat that if the rate hike is denied the good citizens of the state will freeze in the dark, thousands will go jobless, and the seven plagues of Egypt will be visited upon the heads of all concerned.

The pundit takes another approach. He is privy to knowledge not given to ordinary mortals. By manipulation of his runes, figures, charts and formulae he is able to peer where no one else can. Via arcane processes he can foretell the future. The future, of course, says if more money is not forthcoming the mighty utility may go down in ruin — and it's a sure bet citizens will freeze in the dark.

South Carolina Electric and Gas, during this hearing, will pour more than a quarter of a million dollars into pleading its case; into presenting parades of expert pundits and patriots to support their pleas. The irony is the company can charge this off as a legitimate business expense. Rate payers will not only pay the higher rates requested, but they will pay to have the higher rates jammed down their throat.

On the other side, representing the consumer, are Midland Welfare Rights Organization attorney Robert Guild and state Senator Tom Turnipseed, who last week presented a request to the PSC for funds to hire an expert witness to testify on behalf of consumers. The pair were summarily turned down by the commission. The consumer's case is also being pleaded by attorneys for several large industrial firms from Charleston County, and Roy W. Smith, a Mt. Pleasant businessman who describes himself as "just a rate payer."

But the rate payer simply cannot compete in such a situation. For every expert witness the rate payers can hire, the electric company can find a dozen $500 a day experts to plead its case.

Sitting in august judgement of the whole scenario is the Public Service Commission. A body of men who sleep, yawn, talk, walk out of the room and sometimes just plain don't show up for the hearing. A body of men who for the most part are fat cats with air conditioning and electric navel lint pickers who agree, god yes, a world without electricity would be a terrible thing. A few have even been on the receiving end of the utility's generosity in the form of campaign contributions. And presented before them is testimony amounting to several weeks of bullshit. Yes, bullshit.

For example, the company contends it must increase its rate of return in order to attract new investors for its construction and expansion program. That is, it must increase the amount of money a stockholder can make on his investment. The stockholder, of course, is usually painted by the company as the little old lady in Pocotaligo who uses her dividends to supplement her miniscule social security check; in just these two contentions there lies a substantial mound of beef manure.

South Carolina Electric and Gas, as far as utilities are concerned, is in an enviable financial position and not on the brink of financial disaster, as company witnesses would lead one to believe. According to one investment service, the company has a "B double plus" rating on its overall financial picture. Its rate of return is one of the best in the industry and was based on what the investment service called its "excellent earnings performance." In other words, hardly a company about to go down the tubes.

> "For as long as there have been utilities the burden of their expansion has fallen unequally on their customers, with the smallest users paying the highest rates..."

The company's major stockholders, and major beneficiaries of this "excellent earnings performance," are far from little old ladies in Pocotaliago. In fact the SCE&G top stockholders' list reads like a who's who of major finace. SCE&G's major stockholder is Cede & Company which is a nominee, or front, for the New York Stock Exchange. First National Bank of South Carolina is the utility's fourth largest stockholder, coincidentally they also happen to be the company's third largest creditor on short term loans. Other large stockholders, and large creditors, include Morgan Guarantee Trust, Manufacturer's Hanover Trust and United States Trust. All in all, more than 25 percent of the company's stock is owned by major financial institutions, most of them New York banks. In fact less than ten percent of the company's stock is owned by South Carolina residents.

This all makes for an interesting money-go-round. It siphons money from South Carolina rate payers to pay debts to New York banks who are also collecting fat dividends from their stockholdings in the company. These are the investors who feel they need a rate of return higher than they are already getting.

For as long as there have been utilities the burden of their expansion has fallen unequally on their customers, with the smallest users paying the highest rates. For example the cost at today's rates for 250 kilowatt hours, a usage consistent with lighting a small home with perhaps a refrigerator and a washing machine included, is 5.78 cents per kilowatt hour. The very poor who only light small homes and use about 100 kwh pay as much as 8.23 cents per kwh. It's the old adage of "the poor pay more." Under the new rate hike request the poor will be forced to pay even more yet. If you will bear with me through a little fast-figure mumbo jumbo I'll explain.

The company has asked for an increase of $10,950,000 on last year's income of $78,350,000 for residential customers. That adds up to about 13.25 percent. But there is a little hidden catch in here somewhere.

The company is also asking that the base line for the "fuel adjustment clause" be raised from nine mills to 11 mills per kwh. Simply put, the base line works this way: if the base line is nine mills, the company absorbs fuel costs up to nine mills per kwh. If the fuel costs are greater than nine mills, customers are billed for the difference--in addition to their regular usage bill. By increasing the millage, the company is agreeing to absorb fuel costs up to 11 mills, which may seem generous on their part. Not really. Since industrial users consume more kwh than residential users, they will realize the bulk of the savings. The net effect will be to trim $4,450,000 from the announced residential rate hike, and $5,430.000 from the industrial increase. Translated into percentages, the residential customer is facing an actual 8.28 percent increase, and the industrial user a mere 1.57 percent hike.

By raising the fuel base the company has given a break to precisely those customers most likely to challenge the hike--the large industrial users. Since industrial customers consume more than two billion kwh per year, the two mill difference in the base charge adds up to a tidy 15½ million savings over last year's fuel adjustment costs, and significantly softens the impact of the hike.

But aside from all the technical jargon and figure juggling there is one aspect of current rate structures which stands out as a monument to utilities' callous disregard for social conditions and a changing social reality.

In the heyday of growing demand, cheap electricity, and Reddy Kilowatt, utilities instituted what is known as declining block price structures. This is a system that says the more you buy, the less you pay per unit. It is a system which is inherently discriminatory to low-income users.

Picture this: you drive into a gas station and see a price schedule on the pump which says first five gallons 80.9 cents each; next five gallons 65.9 cents each; next five gallons 50.9 cents each; all subsequent gallons 40.9 cents each. No doubt it looks a little ridiculous, but if you're a fat cat with a gas guzzler Cadillac the advantage of the structure is obvious; you pay less per gallon. But what if you own a Volkswagon? There you are at a disadvantage-you will always pay more per gallon since you will always use less than our Cadillac driving friend.

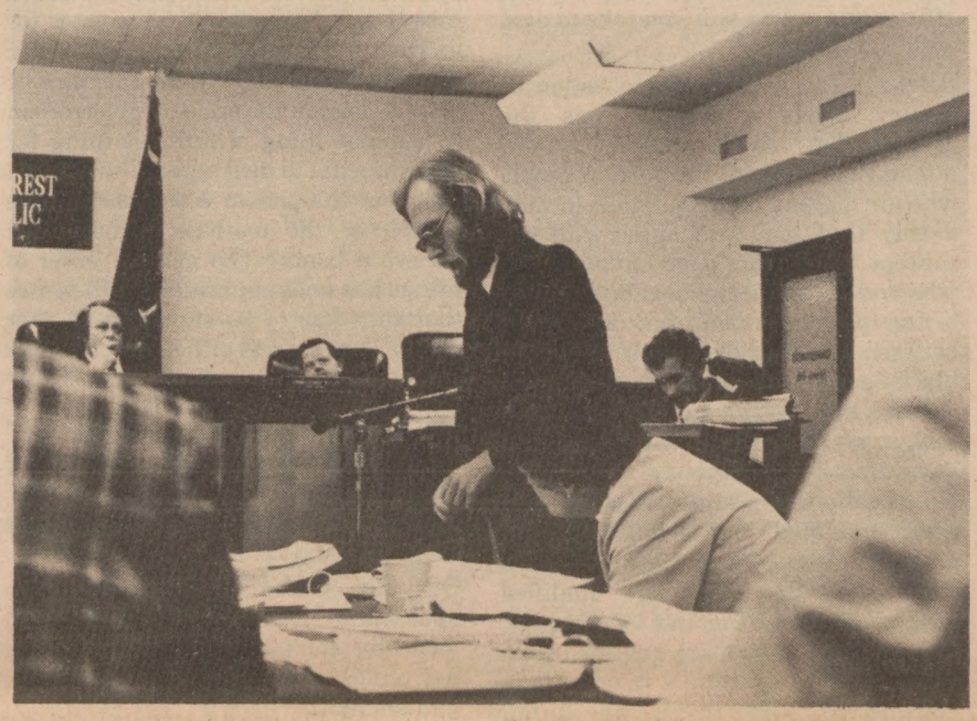
In SCE&G's rate structure, which is the highest in the state, the little user pays up to 8.23 cents per kilowatt hour while the large residential user pays as little as 3.91 cents for the same kilowatt hour of electricity. There is no difference in the kwh used by the big, affluent buyer and that used by the little, generally poor buyer. But the rich pay less than half of what the poor pay for each unit of electricity. This simply amounts to a multi-million dollar subsidy to the affluent from the low-income group, a bonus to the all-electric home dweller from the slum shanty resident, and a bonanza to the individual waiting for a stock dividend check, from those who wait for welfare and social security checks. It is also a major subsidy from the black race to the white race.

The industrial user takes advantage of both the large and small, black and white, residential customer, paying only 1.99 cents per kwh. In fact, although industrial customers account for 33 percent of SCE&G's total electric usage, they produce only 24 percent of the total revenue. The residential customer, on the other hand, accounts for 30 percent of the usage and 40 percent of the revenue.

But the discrimination does not stop there. Each time a utility must construct a new plant to meet a growing demand it needs more money and as a consequence, higher rates. But who generates that additional demand?

The heavy and increasing use of air conditioning, especially in the suburbs, is a primary form of use which contributes to demand and the need for new capacity, yet the higher income families who contribute to the need for new capacity have passed most of these costs along to the smali-use, low-income family. The newer all-electric homes contribute quite significantly to capacity costs and yet these homes have the lowest per kwh rates of all domestic users. And who pays the frieght; the all-electric user who is paying 2.71 cents per kwh and facing a hike of six percent or the ghetto dweller who is paying 8.23 cents per kwh and facing an 8.28 percent hike?

The current structure also discriminates against the inner-city resident and business man. Demand on utility output is, of course, being generated by the growing suburbs. Most utility officials will readily admit that urban areas have reached their saturation point as far as electric usage is concerned; but suburban areas are growing at an astounding rate; bringing with them more all-electric homes and a greater energy demand. City residents do not need most of the plants being built. Existing plants, plus minor additions in some cases, would be sufficient to meet their needs for decades to come. But city residents are in "service areas" which are drawn to include the mushrooming suburbs, so the city people and businesses must pay for the cost of new plants, which they do not need, through larger and larger monthly utility bills.



Bob Guild

And as if this weren't enough, the low-income, mostly black, city dweller gets an additional kick.

In all rate cases the company figures in its "expenses" and has them covered by charges to the customer. Like any good business they want to get back what they pay out but some of those payouts amount, again, to no more than a subsidy of the rich from the poor.

For expample, SCE&G lists as a legitimate business expense dues which it pays for its officers to belong to country clubs, yacht clubs and all-white social clubs such as the Palmetto and Summit Clubs. Its expenses also include salaries, dividends and stock options ranging up to several hundred thousands of dollars for these same officers. The same officers who also live in the all-electric homes in the suburbs.

Meaningful reform in this discriminatory structure and system has taken place in various states. Michigan and New Youk have implemented flat rate structures whereby all users pay the same per kwh charge no matter what their consumption level may be. In Vermont, that state's Public Utility Commission is considering a "Lifeline" rate which guarantees a minimum of electricity at low cost. The proposal would provide up to 400 kwh at a maximum of $10. This amount would never be subject to a rate increase and any additional revenues would have to be made up by charging more in higher usage brackets. This would be of great assistance to individuals on fixed incomes.

As a result of the Michigan commission's decision, about 64 percent of Detroit Edison Company's customers have actually received a decrease as a result of flattening the rate structure.

In its proceedings, the commission stated for the record that flat rates are "in the public interest and will provide an economic incentive to conserve electricity and the low income user will be paying a fairer price for his energy needs."

Three weeks ago the South Carolina Public Service Commission held an informational hearing on statewide rate structures, during which consumer advocates argued the case for flat rate structures and lifeline rates. The Commission took it all under advisement, but individuals active in seeking reform don't expect much will come of it.

Several commissioners have indicated some interest in the reforms, "and may want to nudge the utilities in direction of adopting some of them," as one source put it, but these commissioners are in the minority.

Sen. Tom Turnipseed, who argued for rate structure reform at that hearing, says that "given the commission's overall attitude toward the utilities, I doubt if any serious reform will take place."

So South Carolina, with the highest utility rates in the entire southeast, will probably lag well behind in eliminating discrimination. South Carolina, a state which nationally is 49th in per capita income and 13th in utility costs, may very well be 51st in eliminating an unfair burden on poor and moderate income residents who bear the brunt of the current system.

education. I don't ever recall any particular legislative issue dealing with that.

OS: It wasn't a legislative issue, it was a situation where Greenville County had to do something. Even before the final court order, it must have been apparent to you that it was inevitable--that this point would be reached.

Riley: Well, it wasn't inevitable.

OS: How did you personally feel about integration at that time?

Riley: Well, I personally favor integration in any public facility, or any other way--and practice it.

OS: Okay, but at that time, were you speaking out on it, were you speaking out in those terms saying you favored integration in all public facilities and in all public schools--to the point where you would have been considered a leader in the fight to integrate the schools in Greenville County?

Riley: I would say that I as much as anybody in the state would be in that category, but I don't recall any specifics. I was involved, for example, in my church when we were talking about unifying the Methodist church--the black and the white districts.

I would suspect--and I haven't looked back to see it--but any public pronouncement that I ever made, that I recall, has been in the direction of integration, human rights, what have you. I think anybody in Greenville will tell you I have that reputation. I can't recall any specific (instance of) getting up and calling for more stronger integration of the schools. We had integration at that time, but this court order was a traumatic thing because it called for total integration; and I was certainly in the forefront of that.

OS: Did you agree with the court order when it came down?

Riley: I agreed with the principles of it. Of course at the time I felt thirty days was short, we might ought to have sixty days or something like that. However, it was probably the best thing that could have been done, and the court was right in what it did.

OS: If we could, we'd like to move from this subject to the subject of black voters, minority issues and so forth. We keep hearing that Mr. Harvey's doing a fairly good job of organizing a lot of the traditional black leadership. What are you doing along those lines, to attract black voters and to address the problems of minorities in your campaign?

Riley: Well, I'm doing all I can, in attempting to contact as many blacks who have respect of other blacks, who have political influence with blacks (and) people who don't have influence with others. I think I'll do very well in that regard. Now I haven't been involved in that effort certainly as long as Brantley has--in campaigning--he's just been running longer than I have. In the term of months that I've been involved in it, I've done extremely well and have had very good acceptance up and down the line.

OS: Is this an area you're giving a good deal of attention to?

Riley: Yeah. I think it's a very important area, certainly in the Democratic primary it's extremely important. And it's an area I'm extremely interested in. I think I've shown in the legislature that I have sensitivities that respect people with special problems. Blacks have special problems. And I attempt to be tuned into that.

OS: There's been a lot of discussion about minority discrimination in state agencies. As governor, what sort of affirmative action will you take to deal with that problem?

Riley: ...You get into the question of agency heads and who runs the agencies--but as Governor, I will attempt to bring out the good in people who are making those decisions in such a way that they will agree with my concept that blacks ought to be in key jobs in state government where they are hiring people. I draw the distinction between the hirer and the hired. Until blacks are in a position where they are making key decisions on who is hired, really we haven't opened up state government to everybody. And that's what really worries me; you see a lot of good, qualified blacks--it worrys me when people say 'I'm for hiring qualified blacks,' yet they don't say 'qualified whites.' And I see that in a lot of things. A black has to be more qualified than anybody else, oftentimes, in order to be considered. And that's an unfair burden.

OS: Mr. West, at the beginning of his administration, said minority discrimination in state employment was something he was going to deal with in his administration. Yet obviously it is still a problem.

Riley: I'll deal with it. But I don't have an specific right now.

OS: What about this possibility. Someone was telling us, or pointing out to us, the other day that no governor had ever really set up a specific person--a civil rights coordinator, a person whose specific job would be to monitor this kind of thing. And I think the governor has some power to put pressure on the state agencies through his involvement with federal funding. It seems the governor could affect some changes.

Riley: I think so.

OS: Would you go as far as to set up an individual to do this kind of job?

Riley: In what I considered to be the most effective way, I would try to get that (the elimination of discrimination) done. And again, I would have my own way of doing it.

OS: One area in which blacks have evinced a great deal of concern is capital punishment. I'm sure you've answered the question many times, but would you reiterate your position on capital punishment for us?

Riley: What I have said about the measure that was passed this year is that I would have voted against it. I would have submitted an amendment in the Senate if I had been there to have only three strict qualifying justifications for having a person being subject to capital punishment. Terrorism, wherein someone was killed; kidnapping, wherein someone was killed; and second murder. I think in those three instances, you can make a much better case on capital punishment being a deterrent. I'm not comfortable with that as what Solomon would do or say. I don't like capital punishment; I've never liked it. But that's what I would have done if I had been in the Senate.

OS. If you don't like it, why would you have done it?

Riley: Because I think in those instances it could very likely involve the lives of others.

OS: You exclude specifically murders during the commission of another felony, an armed robbery or a rape or whatever. Why do you exclude those?

Riley: Those are degree situations. If somebody had put in an amendment to add murder while in the commission of a rape, I very likely would have voted for it. The three areas that hit me as being the most important were the three I named. I think the problem of terrorism is a major thing, a difficult thing for governments to deal with. What do you do about the person who comes in the church or the football stadium and throws a bomb? The general order of things has to be maintained in the sense that that has to be stopped if it ever starts. That's a real difficult problem for any country.

OS: Are you suggesting you believe then that capital punishment might be a deterrent to crime?

Riley: I think in those three instances I think it would be more a deterrent.

OS: But you're not philosophically opposed to capital punishment. You basically don't like killing, but you're not philosophically opposed to capital punishment.

Riley: I am philosophically opposed to capital punishment.

OS: But you would vote in favor of it?

Riley: I would vote in favor it in those three instances. I would doubt I would vote to relax it anymore than that.

OS: Does the governor in this state have the power to commute a death sentence to life?

Riley: I think he still has that power. I'd have to check to be sure. You know, we reorganized all that under the Probation, Parole and Pardon Board, but I still...Of course, you haven't had that come up in so long.

OS: A governor of another state recently said he would commute all death sentences to life. Assuming the governor has that power in this state, would you be willing to use that power that the governor has to commute death sentences that you disagreed with?

Riley: Yes, that I disagreed with.

OS: Well, for example, sentences in situations other than the three instances you've outlined?

Riley: Well, that would be difficult. That would be difficult. I'd have to think that out. First of all, I'd have to see what the governor's powers are. And I don't know that I would take the personal position of changing the law. I would have to deal with that. I haven't thought it out. That's interesting, though.

OS: I thought it was too.

OS: I believe you were second vice-chairman of the nuclear committee in the Senate for several years.

Riley: I think that's right. That was a rather inactive committee.

OS: What do you see as the nuclear future of the state, and what is your view on the future of the Barnwell reprocessing plant?

Riley: On Barnwell, my position is that I would not have the background and knowledge to critique the present position of the administration in Washington on something as important to the world as the possibility of proliferation of nuclear weapons and consequently nuclear war. I don't think anything could be more important than trying to affect that situation. If people I respect in Washington say that cleaning plutonium is dangerous in the world, that's impressive to me. And I'm not going to say as a person who's not all that familiar with the data and the facts that that is wrong.

I do think, based on the information I have, that the government has been involved in what has been developed in Barnwell to the extent that they have let that develop and occur with the high expense of private industry and the high commitment of a community of people, and it's a situation that the government, I think, is partially responsible for, and I do think that it makes good sense for the government then to be involved in seeing that it is put to a proper, safe use. I see that as a responsibility of the federal government, and I would take that position if I was in the U.S. Congress. But I say a safe use, consistent with what the administration is trying to do.

OS: What about further nuclear development, the development of nuclear-oriented industries around Barnwell and the state?

Riley: Well, we have certainly a right heavy use of nuclear energy in South Carolina in relation to most other states. I would be very concerned about any significant extension of that use. I think that we have it here; we've got to deal with it, and we need to deal with it in a safe way as we can. But I would certainly be hesitant to encourage any significant expansion of the use at this time.

OS: Would you eventually support the plant being used for its original purpose, as a reprocessing plant?

Riley: The best I can say about that is that I would be fairly strongly influenced by either the administration in Washington, or others who have a lot of expertise in that area, and who I think are not fixed in their position.

OS: When you talk about expertise, do you agree that it will be very important for whoever becomes governor in 1978 to develop personal expertise, not only in the area of nuclear energy, but energy in general?

Riley: No question about that. Energy is a significant problem; it's directly related to the environment, which is another significant problem, both of which are going to be state problems in a sense, and I'm going to be prepared to deal with them. I'm now reading anything I can get my hands on on nuclear energy, on reprocessing, on all the various aspects of it. It's very important, it's nothing we can stick our heads in the sand on, we've got to deal with it. I don't think it ought to be handled in an emotional way. And I think we start from a position that we have a lot of nuclear here.

OS: Economic development balanced against environmental impacts is a continuing issue in the state. What's your philosophy of industrial development?

Riley: My philosophy is that we should have systematic development, planned hopefully in a sense that the environmental issues remain a strong consideration. We had I think an average growth of 16 percent at one time in 1974 and 1975; of course it went way down and it really hasn't come back out. I think one major new industry might jack it up this year--the aluminum plant. But that's not a systematic type thing.

I would like to see an impetus put on planned industrial development in some of the rural areas of the state where people don't have either jobs or good jobs. We may not have a very high unemployment rate in South Carolina, but we have a very high underemployment rate. That gets back into education, which I won't get off into again.

OS: But the first thing the development board is going to tell you is that those rural areas that need industry the most are the least attractive to new industry. They very often don't have the amenities, or even the basics, new industry is looking for.

Riley: That's where I think the state can be involved, in having a systematic plan. I think that it's good for government to plan. I don't think the plan ought to run the government, but I think the only way you can move into the future is to look ahead five years or ten years--what do you want South Carolina to look like a hundred years from now? Is that important to you, or is it just important that everybody's going to be making a real good salary now? I think you've got to think all that out, and I think from the environmental standpoint, I would like a planned development for the future. And I think that fits into industrial development and the conservation issues, and others.

OS: Would you support state programs that would go in and work in these rural areas to encourage development?

Riley: Yes, I'm talking about being, as governor, personally involved in systematic planned industrial growth at a desirable level considering environmental considerations.

Riley touched on his views on incentives to industry to locate in South Carolina.

Riley: I don't think that industries now are hunting for a free situation, but I think they are hunting for a stable situation, one is which there is good labor in a labor-intensified industry; I think they are hunting for a place in which there is high consideration for education.

OS: What about hunting for a place where there is a right-to-work law? What's your position on right-to-work legislation?

Riley: Oh, I favor the right-to-work law.

OS: Is that at odds with being a progressive Democrat?

Riley: Well, I don't know what it's at odds with. It's my view that a person's got a perfect, absolute right to belong to a labor union and also has a perfect, absolute right not to belong to one.

OS: So you would be against repeal of 14-B?

Riley: Yes.

OS: Some people say you have heavy ties with the textile industry. Is that the case?

Riley: Well, of course I'm from a textile area; I'm not ashamed of that. The textile industry is very important (in the Piedmont). I don't know that my ties are any heavier with them than with anyone else. I am going to do this: as far as any campaign contributions are concerned, I'm going to put a personal limit on any contributions I received from any one source. Of course the law doesn't require that, but I am going to see that I retain my independence in a sense.

OS: We'd like to get into that in a minute, but first of all, what about the textile industry and your desire to see rural development. If there's any industry which is in those areas now, it is the textile industry, where they enjoy in some places the advantage of being the only game in town. The competition for labor is slight. Won't they resist development in those areas, and how will you deal with that?

Riley: Well, I think it's a dangerous thing to say that any industry has done this or has done that. I don't think that I could say that the textile industry has caused serious problems in the state. In our section of the state it's been the source of jobs and livelihood for a lot of people who otherwise wouldn't have them.

I think that textile people, or the textile industry, are just like the services of any other industry. There are progressive-minded people and there are those who are not so progressive. And I think to lump together an industry which involves thousands and thousands of people and say they are standing in the way of progress--well, I'm certainly not in a position to say that.

> '...I think that it's good for government to plan. I don't think the plan ought to run the government, but I think the only way you can move into the future is to look ahead five years or ten years--what do you want South Carolina to look like a hundred years from now..."

OS: You were talking about contributions just now, and you mentioned you were going to put a limit on the amount of contibutions. What is that limit going to be? Also, how do you feel about disclosure. What will be your procedure so far as disclosure of contributions and expenditures are concerned?

Riley: My present inclination is a limit of $5000, from one source.

OS: How would you define a source?

Riley: Well, an association would be a source, a corporation would be a soruce, an individual would be a source. I don't think I would have a limit on individual contributions. That's my present inclination. But for corporations, for associations, say a $5000 limit. Now that's not fixed, but I'm looking at that.

OS: I'm not suggesting of course that you would, but that would be fairly easy to get around, wouldn't it? If you didn't have a limit on individuals, then funds that might normally come from businesses and associations could be funneled through individuals.

Riley: Well, of course—are you saying we ought to have a limit on individuals too?

OS: Well, if it isn't across the board, there's always a route for the money to flow around the strictures.

Riley: Well, there's always--there's no question about that. Of course, generally I have felt I would not limit individual (contributions). If I think that's a problem, I would limit that. I'm not talking about a $25 limit, so it's really not--it's not like I'm on to something--I might very well put a limit on individuals.

You asked about disclosure. The law says about disclosure that we would have to disclose within 30 days after the election--well, two weeks before the election it has to be opened to public scrutiny. My disclosure would be--my present plan is to disclose everything on December 31 of this year that has come in up to that point; to disclose again maybe three months after that, say April; and subsequently after that either weekly or monthly or daily, however I decide to do it.

OS: Does that mean expenditures as well as contributions? Would you disclose expenditures?

Riley: Well, expenditures I would disclose, but probably publicly by categories, like transportation, media, that kind of thing.

OS: Newspaper stories several weeks ago reporting on a Greenville fundraiser held in your behalf said you had raised in pledges, checks and cash $100,000 in Greenville County alone.

Riley: Well, some of the money involved had come in before that fundraiser; I think $16,000-$18,000 had come in. Out of the fundraiser--the people who are handling my campaign contributions, we made up a list of Greenvillians who were people we thought could afford to make a good contribution--good in terms of amount. A lot of them are people I grew up with, that I played football with, that I grew up with their children, that I worked with in the practice of law, or in some other way in Greenville. Mostly the 'close personal friends' kind of thing. But it was a list--if you tried to take the political leanings of any of them, there would have been Republicans in the group, a lot of Indpendents.

OS: Was money from the textile industry involved in the $100,000?

Riley: Well I don't know of any textile corporate contributions that we've had. There certainly will be.

This business of finances is a part of making a statewide race. I don't particularly like it; I don't think anybody does, but you've got to do it. And I'm going to try to do it in a responsible way. I'm going to set a budget, I'm going to try to raise the budget, and I'm going to try to live by it. As to whether or not I'm able to do those three things, I think is a good test of how responsibly I can handle the economic affairs of South Carolina.

OS: I assume then the answer that you're giving me is that you don't really know how much of that money might have been from textile interests. Could you speculate on how significant textile contributions will be to your campaign? From what you're saying, it sounds like it's going to be very significant.

Riley: I don't know that. I don't see anything wrong in getting a contribution from a person who is in the textile industry. There's no more wrong in that, as I see it, as getting a contribution from someone who is in the banking industry, or the legal industry, or the medical profession.

OS: What's your position on workman's compensation for brown lung, in light of the fact that you will have significant contributions coming from the textile industry. Or not in light of that fact.

Riley: I would have supported the brown lung legislation (passed this year). I don't remember in waht form we had it before in the Senate, but I voted for it. It might have been to take it out of committee--Senator Lourie's legislation--but I remember I voted for it in an affirmative way, at one time, as I recollect it. Whether that was a recorded vote or not--I think it was. And I would have supported that concept (in the recent bill). If a person has an occupational disease as a result of their employment, they ought to come within the purview of the workman's compensation law.

I've represented, by the way, employees in workman's compensation cases. I've never represented employers.

OS: That raises a good question. What is your point of view regarding legislators who appear before state boards and commission, which they sometimes elect and set salaries for?

Riley: Well, you get into a judgemental matter. You're not going to be able to have that defined clearly, but you are going to have the public's right to look at a person's judgement in that area. Of course the Industrial Commission which considers workman's compensation cases is not selected by the legislature; so do you tell a lawyer who represents people who get hurt on the job that he can't or she can't represent these people anymore (because he or she is in the legislature). I'm not prepared to go that far with our legislative system. I don't see that as anything unethical, to me at this time.

You come then to a personal judgemental situation, where every person has to be judged on their sensitivities. I'm a lawyer, I've got clients, I think I've got good clients, I think I'm a good lawyer. I think my legal background has helped me tremendously in what I've done in the legislature. I think lawyers like to deal in legislation, because that's the ultimate creation of the law. So I don't see taking a person out of the world, and putting them in the legislature, and saying oh, that's a great clean person unrestrained by any of the influences of the world. Then we have a grand, plastic legislator.

OS: Would you favor a system in which legislators were compensated sufficiently to devote their full time to the job and in which there were restrictions on outside activities while serving in the legislature? And secondly, would you favor limiting the number of terms during which a legislator could serve?

Riley: I at this time would not favor the full-time professional legislator. Someday I might think differently about that, but right now I'm more inclined towards the thinking that the legislature is better not to have full-time professionals, for a number of reasons. Number one, you could not pay people enough to where you could get the caliber of people that you have how, so to speak, in a lot of senses. And then you'd have that constant pressure on salaries. You'd end up having professional people who would be perhaps mediocre. The fact that they deal only in that profession would have some concern to me. Not a great deal--I don't think there's any magic in the fact that a person has to go out and work for a living; I've known very good legislators that didn't have to work for a living, but devoted pretty much full time to the legislature.

OS: Do you think public service requires some sacrifice on the part of the individuals involved?

Riley: I think it's a sacrifice for a good legislator. It's not a sacrifice for someone who just goes down and just votes and goes to banquets.

What was the other question you asked?

OS: About limitation of terms.

Riley: That's interesting to me. I personally would like that. I think after a period of years, a person probably would be more productive with a change of the guard. That affected my decision not to run for the Senate again. I enjoyed serving in the Senate; I enjoyed the adversary system, and I knew the rules, I knew the people, I knew when to do what and how to do it. I would have gotten a committee chairmanship; in Senate terms, that is important--you then get a staff. And I was wondering if that meant a lot to me; the big table and the big chairs and the high ceilings; and I decided if that was important to me, I had lost something that I once had.

That was not the only reason obviously, but that was part of my decision not to run again. Another major part was that I didn't want to be a member of the Senate running for Governor or whatever. If I was going to run for Senate, I wanted to be in the Senate. But I don't know that I would think that anymore than a personal thing at this time. Faced with a decision of whether or not a person could not serve after 12 years or so, I might support that, but I see it as sort of a personal thing. For me, I think the guard ought to be changed. I needed to be reexcited about things. I like the idea of limited terms. ...Experience I think is important, but I don't think it's good to have a system where a lots of people, most of the leadership people, have been in the same capacity for a long period of time--that causes a sluggish feeling in a legislative body.

OS: Let me ask you a few more things in the limited time we have left. A few years ago you gained a reputation in the area of judicial reform. I'm sure you don't feel judicial reform is complete. In the area of criminal law, what changes would you advocate, specifically in the area of victimless crimes; for instance, marijuana, prostitution, gambling, obscenity.

Riley: Of course the bar has made some recommendations dealing with criminal laws and criminal justice. Judicial reform is going to affect all that, primarily because I think we're going to end up having speedier justice, which is good I think for all concerned. We're going to have a system that is managed in an administrative way. But judicial reform does not get into areas like the inherent power of a judge, for example. So in judicial reform, we had to get the structure straight first. Then we can go into the various offshoots of that. One dealing with the criminal aspects of juvenile crimes, for example. The so-called status offenses. You know, a child runs off from home, goes thirty miles, is picked up and put into the reformatory. If his daddy does the same thing, that's not a crime. Those are interesting things to me--to see to it that juveniles have the same shake in the system as adults do.

I have recently been asked by the president of the State Bar to serve on the Bar judicial reform committee, which I accepted, and I plan to get involved in that this year, from a Bar standpoint.

I think from the criminal justice standpoint, pre-sentence investigation is extremely important; we have that in the federal system. All these things cost money; that becomes important, too. I think it's very important to move in the direction of consistency of sentencing. People don't understand why two persons who commit the same offense basically, and one will get probation and the other five years. I think a judge has to have some discretion, but I think you've got to have more guidelines, more consistency of sentencing.

OS: Are you for or against decriminalization of marijuana?

Riley: My inclination, primarily from a judicial reform standpoint, would be to perhaps decriminalize marijuana. I think it's kind of a clog in the system of disposing of matters pertaining to justice. I haven't fixed my ultimate decision on that, but if I had to vote right now, I'd be inclined in that direction. I would not want to legalize--and I draw a complete distinction between legalization and decriminalization.

I will be sharpening my positions on judicial reform as the year progresses, and I will be much more definitive on judicial reform matters and the revision of criminal procedures as the campaign begins.

OS: Thank you.

Exhibit" will be the works of Tom Campbell, Robert Glover, Terry Parke and Bob Rowan. Museum hours are 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday thru Saturday and 2 p.m. thru 6 p.m. on Sundays. The museum is closed on Mondays. Admission to the exhibits is free. If you would like additional information, call Candy Baker at 799-2810.

Specials

The Family Service Center will offer a seminar called "How To Decide" on three consecutive Monday evenings beginning on July 18th. The course, which is open to men and women, will attempt to help people to learn how to make decisions and how to be responsible for them. The group will meet from 7 to 9 p.m. on each of the three Mondays. If more information is desired, call Joan Gelfman-Lamkin at 779-3250.

The South Carolina State Library and the S.C. Wildlife Federation have recently completed a 16mm documentary film which explores, in-depth, the pros and cons of the controversial Richard B. Russell Dam project. The film is entitled, "The Russell Dam, A Question of Values", and it will be shown this summer and fall at many public libraries throughout the state. Also, interested groups or organizations desiring a special viewing of the film should contact the S.C. Wildlife Federation.

Citizen's for the Advancement of the Physically Handicapped will hold an Awareness Day on Saturday, July 23rd at Dutch Square Mall from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. The event is to, hopefully, aquaint the public with the problems as well as the pleasures experienced by handicapped persons in their daily lives. The program will include wheelchair races, wheelchair square dancing and wheelchair basketball.

A seminar in Assertiveness Training will be offered by the Family Service Center (for men and women) beginning Wednesday, August 3rd. The group will meet for five consecutive Wednesdays from 7:30 to 10 p.m. and will be led by Ms. Marlene Hale. The overall focus of the program will be to promote better communication and pre-registration is required for those who wish to take part. For additional information or to pre-register, call Ms. Hale at 779-3250.

The U.S. Forest Service will hold two wilderness evaluation workshops in South Carolina on Friday, July 22nd and Friday, July 29th. The objective of the workshops is to inventory possible candidate areas in the Francis Marion and Sumter National Forests and to give the public the opportunity to suggest national criteria to be used in evaluating the inventoried areas for possible uses. The July 22nd workshop will be held at the Baptist College at Charleston. The public is invited and for those who cannot attend, written proposals and comments will be taken until September 15th, 1977.

Theatre

The new Wade Hampton Dinner Theatre continues with its production of "LUV" every Thursday, Friday and Saturday night through July 23rd. The comedy by Murray Schisgal will begin each night at 8:30 p.m. and admission is $11 per person. Group rates for 20 or more persons are also available. If more information is needed call the Wade Hampton Hotel.

Now playing at the new Carolina Town House Dinner Theatre (1615 Gervais Street, Columbia) is "6 RMS RIV VU" where two happily married strangers meet and ultimately get locked into a vacant apartment together. Bell Productions, formerly of the Hier's Dinner Theatre, is producing this comedy which runs every Friday and Saturday night thru the 6th of August. The show starts at 8:30 p.m. and tickets are $11 per person for the show and the buffet. For reservations call 771-8711, ext. 153.

Ann Benson, John Grant in rehearsal for "Bye Bye Birdie"

Workshop Theatre will present a summer family musical with "Bye Bye Birdie" at the A.C. Flora Theatre July 29th thru August 6th (except July 31st and August 1st). The performances will begin at 7:30 p.m. each night and tickets are priced at $5 for adults; $4 for students, senior citizens and the military; and $2 for children 12 and under. Group rates are also available. The box office is located at 1136 Bull Street and it opens Monday, July 25th for advance ticket sales from 12:30 to 5:30 p.m. Monday thru Saturday. Tickets at the door will go on sale an hour before curtain time. More information can be had by calling 799-4876 and asking for Sally Thigpen.

Perhaps in future years, with the advent of advanced computer-connected cable television information systems with a hundred or more channels, nonprice information costs will recede for the consumer. In the meantime, there's little you can do. If you wish to buy a big-ticket item, it's always good to first go to the library and check through "Consumer Reports" and similar magazines. But for most of the things you buy, resign yourself to the sad fact that you're being taken to the cleaners almost every time you buy any American product anywhere.

Cinema

ATLANTIC I THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790.

The usual fare of X-rated features with "Hot Wives" and "Pleasure Bed", beginning continuous runs at 11 a.m.

ATLANTIC II THEATRE, 3220 Two Notch Road, 786-0790.

"Visions" and "Cherry Truckers" are featured this weekend, both rated X, beginning continous runs at 11 a.m.

CAROLINA THEATRE, 1223 Main Street, 252-8011.

More karate with "Black Fist", chop-chop, dig-dig. It's rated R for plenty of violence.

COLUMBIA EAST I THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350.

"Star Wars", starring Alex Guiness, Peter Cushing and Mark Hamill, continues at two Columbia theatres. It's rated PG.

COLUMBIA EAST II THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350.

"The Island of Dr. Moreau" continues for a second week at two Columbia theatres. It stars Burt Lancaster and Michael York and it's rated PG.

DUTCH SQUARE NORTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110.

"Herbie Goes to Monte Carlo" continues for another week. It stars Dean Jones and Don Knotts and it's rated G, of course.

DUTCH SQUARE SOUTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110.

"Island of Dr. Moreau", starring Burt Lancaster and Michael York, continues for a second week. It's based on the H.G. Wells story and it's rated PG.

FOX THEATRE, 1607 Main Street, 254-5212.

Playboy's feature film "Alice in Wonderland" didn't do so well as an X-rated spoof on the old tale, so this re-release is rated R. That means they cut out all the heavy sex?

GAMECOCK I THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022.

"Outlaw Blues" with Peter Fonda and Susan St. James continues in Cayce. It's rated PG.

GAMECOCK II THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022.

If you don't know by now, "Silver Streak" has run in Columbia longer than any other movie and it's still running. It stars Gene Wilder and Richard Pryor and it's rated PG.

JEFFERSON SQUARE THEATRE, Jefferson Square, Downtown, 254-6731.

"Sorcerer" continues for another week, downtown. It stars Roy Scheider and an international cast, and it's rated PG.

MIRACLE THEATRE, 1229 Main Street, 779-0826.

"The Other Side of Midnight" continues downtown for another week. It's billed as a soap opera/love story and it's rated R. Showtimes are 1, 4:10, 7:20 and 10:30 p.m.

PALMETTO THEATRE, 1417 Main Street, 765-0292.

Joseph E. Levine's "A Bridge Too Far" continues for another week, downtown. It stars a host of big name stars and it's rated PG. Shows start at 3, 6 and 9 p.m.

PLAZA III THEATRE, 1323 Main Street, 254-7960.

Double feature karate time with "The Bodyguard", starring Sonny Sheeba, and "Goodbye Bruce Lee", starring guess who? Both are rated R.

RICHLAND MALL I THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-2228.

They say the whole family will love "For the Love of Benji" which continues for another week. It's rated G, of course, and shows begin at 1:30, 3:15, 5, 6:45 and 8:30 p.m.

RICHLAND MALL II THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-2228.

Robert Shaw and Jackie Bisset star in "The Deep" which is based on a novel by Peter Benchley and the box office success of "Jaws". It's rated PG and showtimes are 2:45, 5, 7:15 and 9:30 p.m.

SPRING VALLEY I THEATRE, Two Notch Road at I-20, Dentsville, 788-8220.

"Star Wars" continues, but with a new twist. They finally put in a Dolby stereo system which, some say, improves the movie. So why did they wait so long to get it? The flick is rated PG, stars Alex Guiness, Peter Cushing and newcomer Mark Hamill.

SPRING VALLEY II THEATRE, Two Notch Road at I-20, Dentsville, 788-8220.

The biggest Bond ever in "The Spy Who Loved Me" begins its Columbia run at two Dentsville theatres. It stars Roger Moore and Barbara Bach. Rated PG.

SPRING VALLEY III THEATRE, Two Notch Road at I-20, Dentsville, 788-8220.

"The Spy Who Loved Me" is featured at this theatre, too. It stars Roger Moore and Barbara Bach. Rated PG.

SPRING VALLEY IV THEATRE, Two Notch Road at I-20, Dentsville, 788-8220.

"Rocky", last year's best according to the Academy Awards, continues. It stars Sylvester Stallone in his own screenplay. It's rated PG.

Music

Singer-songwriter Jimmy Buffett has been added to the entertainment schedule for Carowinds for the month of July. He will appear for two shows on Saturday, July 23rd. Admission to the concert will cost $2 and that is in addition to the regular park admission price of $7.

"Late Night" entertainment at the Basil Pot Restaurant this Saturday (July 23rd) will feature Lee Knight. Knight was raised in the Adirondack Mountains where he learned traditional folk songs and stories from the loggers and miners and he will be sharing those with you. He has appeared throughout the U.S. as well as in the Soviet Union, Scotland and South America. The show begins at 9:30 p.m. and a donation of 75 cents would be appreciated.

Carolina Coliseum will host the Doobie Brothers on Friday, July 29th at 8 p.m. Ticket prices for the shows will be $7, $6 and $5 and tickets can be obtained at the Coliseum box office.
